Spatial Disparities And Development Policy

spatial disparities and development policy. As a country develops, economies of scale tend to result in increasing spatial concentration of industry and services. Agglomeration of economic activities widens the income gap between "leading" and "lagging" subregions within a country and creates a disparity in access to basic public services. Over the course of seven sessions, the workshop explored the inter-

The UNU-WIDER project on 'Spatial Disparities in Human Development' has collected and analyzed evidence on the extent of spatial inequalities within developing countries. The studies find that spatial inequalities are high, with disparities between rural and urban areas, and also between geographically advantaged and disadvantaged regions. In many countries such disparities are increasing, partly as a consequence of the uneven impact of trade openness and globalization. While there are ...

The third section of the report will discuss the policy implications, in essence identifying the public policy priorities that help countries to realize the immediate economic benefits of greater concentration and the social and long-term economic benefits of moderate spatial disparities. In essence, the report will emphasize that neighborhoods are important for development. This is true for cities, for regions, and for countries: it is difficult for a city to prosper in the middle of a ...

Spatial disparities in the UK have far outstripped those in France, Spain, Italy, Germany and (at state level) the US. In the post-war period, the UK pioneered regional policy to address spatial disparities based on economic, social and political arguments for more balanced development that promoted wider economic opportunity and better mobilised the assets, resources and skills of people and places across the nation.

In theory, as some places decline and others grow, people and businesses move from one to another - but the depth and persistence of spatial disparities suggest that geographical mobility is not working as expected. The evidence suggests a slow long-term decline in geographical mobility. With a new immigration policy, places will become even more dependent on retaining and attracting talent.
