Michael Riffaterre (1924-2006) | Columbia | French

According to Michael Riffaterre, the poetic text is structured in such a way that it repeats many variants of the same invariant. This invariant is the semantic nucleus of the text, to which Riffaterre eventually gives the name "hypogram". The hypogram, which determines and generates the written poem, is an important index in understanding the poem. We can find the hypogram of a text by ...

Relatively little of Michael Riffaterre's prodigious output has been collected in book form, and the volumes of the MLA Bibliography list only about half of his articles; my hope is that this listing will help fill in the bibliographical gaps and also constitute a usefully condensed overview of and orientation to the course of his work. This checklist attempts to provide a complete listing of ...

"Michael Riffaterre: A Checklist of Writings through 1996 ...

According to Michael Riffaterre, a poem does not signify in the same way as a prose text. When poetry is analyzed, often "words are judged in relation to things, and the text is judged in comparison to reality" (Riffaterre, 1983, 26). In order to avoid this, we must understand what distinguishes poetic language from the language of prose: A poem establishes a system of significance, generated ...
